Depictions of Children in Literature and the Arts

An in-depth research workshop.
You learn what a literary researcher does—by doing it.

On the first day, with the help of library specialists, you select a text about children from our archives. Then we all work together, posing research questions, discovering background, following up leads. By the last day, you have become the expert on your text: you can explain to the rest of us exactly why it is important and what it tells us. Fast-paced original work.
